REVO Uninstaller

Revo is a far better uninstaller than the Add/Remove Programs applet built into Windows. It's a no-sweat tool to remove programs, and gives you useful information about each of the programs you've installed, For instance, you can see when you installed a program, the product's company name, its location on your drive, and if you need it, a quick, automatic Google lookup on the program's name.

Revo goes an extra couple of steps and digs deep into the Registry removing junk that Windows Add/Remove leaves behind. That's valuable because it rids your PC of backup and empty files and folders; it also removes Registry entries that are no longer needed. (It sure sounds like I'm contradicting myself about Registry entries. The difference is Revo removes them automatically, so sure, let it do its job. That's different from spending time doing it yourself with a Registry cleaner.)

BTW, the first time I used Revo, I was concerned when I saw the display of Registry entries it planned to remove. But I stopped worrying after I reviewed the dialog's instructions and saw that Revo was removing just the leftover entries. And Revo sets a System Restore Point before it does its work.

Note: If the Yahoo Toolbar is on your system, it gives me a chance to talk about how to use Revo Uninstaller to remove it.
